magnetic field with greater divergence. Three-dimensional analysis of the magnetic field

----- Once the computation of the field along the surface of the cube has been obtained, the results can be extrapolated to three dimensions using the three-dimensional closed field code [@Molina99] and the three-dimensional open field code [@Monsen-etal99] for comparison purposes. Both codes use a divergence-cleaning technique to overcome the problem of divergence in the magnetic field at low altitudes. In the open field case, the magnetic field in a large cube at the origin of coordinates is extrapolated at higher altitudes using points measured in the cube at the lower altitudes. Then a thin shell of points is selected around the cube for the integration, for which the field values vary within a small range of points that are distributed near the cube, and the extrapolated field can be calculated. The cube is divided into three parts, each part being treated as a thin shell of points. In this process, the extrapolation procedure is iterated, and the convergence of the solution is checked. This method avoids the problem of divergence, which occurs in the magnetic field computation based on spline interpolation. In the open field calculations, the extrapolation is not iterated, because the divergence problem is avoided completely. In our previous studies [Kubo-etal02] we used the open field code to obtain the magnetic field at the $1 \times 1 \times 1$ Mm cube. The extrapolation results are compared with the results from the spline interpolation method in Figure [fig1]. Figure [fig1] shows that the magnetic field computation from the closed field code reproduces the results given by the open field code. At the center of the cube, the agreement is quite good. The magnetic field is strongly divergent at the boundaries in the simulations based on the spline interpolation method [Kubo-etal02], which is consistent with the results of the open field extrapolation and the extrapolation using the closed field code [Kubo-etal02; M
