Features Key:

Number of Players- 1
Play from a single game board.
Powerups between games.
2 player and 2 computer games.

How to play:

1. A game of Codebreaker is played on a game board.
2. Each player receives 5 secret codes and, at the start of the game, must select which of these 5 codes will be used by them.
3. A computer selects the 5 codes to be used by the player opposite it and places its own set of codes on the game board.
4. Each player then takes turns to apply one of their 5 secret codes to one of the 5 codes on the board. This is known as a code capture.
5. A player can only use a code that was marked in blue and they have to line up 3 of their own codes in a row.
6. Example- Player 1 has the codes 010 and 030, both in red. Player 1 now applies 010 to one of the blue codes on the board (there are 8 of these blue codes). This results in a new set of codes 010 and 030 (both red). Player 2 can now apply its own codes to these new codes to create a second set of codes for itself 010, 010, 030.

7. Players then take turns to apply each of their sets of codes in this manner until all their codes have been applied and you end up with 3 sets of codes on the board. This is known as the game being closed.
8. The game is then over and it's the players turn to see who has the most active codes on the board and wins.

Playable in the browser. Requires Google Chrome.

With the advent of harvesters in Africa where there is no difficulty in crop rotation, they can have a coconut plantation for 50 years without management within a 10-15 year rotation. You definitely have the right to a coconut plantation if you've tilled and planted the requisite amount land and planted your coconut seed. When you irrigate the soil of the coconuts, you have to also measure the water to avoid crop failure/drill dry. So, planting of the coconut is your right, but you can't get a free pass because you might ask for permission to use a nearby river as your water source. You just have to get another source and use it in place of the river. Dats, if I take a coconut out even after its fruits are ready to harvest, will that plant die after 10-15 years because of no attention from me? Thank you. Even if you don't take care of them, the drier or more exposed environment will eventually allow the tap root to die. The plant can grow in the ground for long years, but it eventually dies if the environment is not favourable. There is no problem if you harvest your coconuts. You can do anything with them but you'll just be breaking the law if you advertise as a "grower" what you are doing. "agitator" is right, all landowners are free to sow their own crops, and the holder of a plantation does not have to give permission to harvest coconuts. If a plantation is part of a larger landholding group, it must inform the others, though. Local governments and farm services have already cracked down, especially in areas with tourist populations. Sometimes the local people take over the farms and hold themselves in the same manner as wealthy collectors: They sell everything during their short summers, and start the farm up again at the end of the season, when the
